BPD is actually about two to three times more prevalent than bipolar disorder or schizophrenia, yet many people have never heard of it. Roughly 10 million Americans -- 75% of which are women -- or 2% of the general population suffer from BPD, a disorder characterized by symptoms of impulsivity, extreme mood swings, fear of abandonment, stormy relationships, self-injuring acts, unstable self-image and intense anger. BPD often occurs in conjunction with other disorders, including depression, substance abuse, eating disorders, anxiety disorders, bipolar disorder or other personality disorders.

The BPD Resource Center is a national non-profit affiliated with New York-Presbyterian Hospital. The Center offers the most comprehensive and current information on BPD, including treatment techniques, and maintains a database of professionals and facilities across the country that treat the disorder.

Leading mental health organizations, as well as the top medical associations, are only now beginning to recognize BPD as a major mental health disorder, and this video was produced to assist the Borderline Personality Disorder (BPD) Resource Center, a national non-profit affiliated with New York-Presbyterian Hospital.

“Due to the complexities of this diagnosis, an extraordinarily large number of people go misdiagnosed for years before receiving proper treatment,” says Dr. Otto Kernberg (Professor of Psychiatry, Weill Medical College of Cornell University.) “But once they begin getting the right treatment and support, many people with borderline personality disorder can sustain loving relationships and enjoy meaningful careers.”

This 45-minute documentary-style video cinematically weaves heart-felt stories of patients and their families living with BPD, and commentary from the top experts in the field with important information on the recognition, diagnosis, and treatment of this devastating disorder.
